Her savings vanished with the fall of the dollar, her rising expenses, and her eternally profligate half-sister Emelina continued to incur debts that Gabriela wound up having to discharge. The only prospect of relief came from Portugal, where the government invited Gabriela Mistral and Palma Guillen to join a group of intellectuals in a visit just prior to Christmas. As reflected in two "recados" that Gabriela Mistral wrote shortly after her first visit to Portugal, consular work and the atmosphere in Spain, along with the opportunity for a vacation from both of these, found her shifting away from an earlier, loose identification with Latin American expatriates, and towards a much more broadly transnational perspective.
