Sporozoites attach to the endothelial lining of liver sinusoids by interactions of their surface proteins CSP and thrombospondin-related anonymous protein [TRAP] with host extracellular matrix proteoglycans Sporozoites glide along the endothelium, then penetrate and traverse Kupffer cells to gain access to hepatocytes Cell traversal seems to depend on at least two sporozoite secretory proteins, one of which contains a perforin-like membrane insertion domain that might allow the sporozoite to breach the cell membrane 73Importantly, sporozoites suppress the respiratory burst in Kupffer cells 75 and inhibit antigen presentation and cytokine release, which in turn might weaken an effective immune response against the parasite Sporozoites can subsequently pass through a number of hepatocytes, which die by necrosis, before settling in a hepatocyte for further liver stage development Figure 1 Liver stage development requires the formation of a specialized membrane compartment, called the parasitophorous vacuole PVin which the parasite is shielded from the host cell cytoplasm Initial PV formation depends on secretory proteins that are characterized by 6-cysteine domains; sporozoites lacking 6-cysteine proteins enter hepatocytes but cannot form a PV 79 and do not undergo subsequent liver stage development.
