For other uses, see Secret history disambiguation. The latter involved deviating pathogenic antibodies to non-functional antibodies and was only effective if applied before immunization, not after hyperthyroidism had been established Systemic sclerosis or scleroderma is one of the most lethal rheumatic diseases characterized by microvascular dysfunction, dysregulation of innate and adaptive immunity, and interstitial and perivascular fibrosis in the skin and internal organs Mechanistically, a hallmark SSc feature is the presence of high serum concentrations of multiple autoantibodies Among these autoantibodies, increased titers of stimulating autoantibodies targeting both angiotensin II type 1 receptor

AT1R and endothelin-1 type A receptor ETAR have been reported to contribute to SSc pathogenesis and suggested as biomarkers for risk assessment of disease progression. Anti-AT1R and anti-ETAR are strong predictors of digital ulcers development; they can be considered as predictive and prognostic biomarkers of SSc-associated pulmonary arterial hypertension and are linked to the development of lung fibrosis and vasculopathies in patients with SSc. Data from mice models show that anti-AT1R and anti-ETAR antibody-positive SSc-IgG cause structural alterations of the lungs. Adaptation and Other Works by Mack Reynolds (Unexpurgated Edition) (Halcyon Classics) induction of interstitial lung disease and obliterative vasculopathy, increased cellular density, and enhanced interstitial cellular infiltrations following passive transfer of IgG from SSc patients to wild-type mice. CCL18 levels in bronchoalveolar fluid and sera directly reflect pulmonary fibrotic activity and are predictive for lung disease progression and mortality in patients with SSc - Additional pathological mechanisms triggered by anti-AT1R and anti-ETAR have been reported such as the increase of neutrophil migration and reactive oxygen species ROS production by neutrophils.
